章节摘录

Prior to the launch of euro banknotes , each NCB was responsible for commissioning production of its national requirements , and although there was a small amount of crossborder movement of banknote stocks for logistical reasons , the code letter was a good indicator of the issuing NCB. However , in the present post-launch phase , a decentralized pooling system is in operation , which means that individual NCBs are only responsible for the production of one or two specific banknote denominations. This , coupled with the ability of an NCB to re-issue any euro banknotes which have been brought into the respective country , means that the prefix code letter no longer provides a direct link to the issuer of a banknote. Coins The Member States of the euro area are responsible for issuing euro coins. In practice , this task is typically taken care of by the Treasury Departments of the National Finance Ministries , while the coins are produced by the national mints. EU finance ministers meeting at Verona in spring 1996 decided that the euro coins would have a common European side and an individual national side. The Commission launched a Europe-wide competition to select a design for the common face. The competition was based on three themes : architectural and ornamental style , aims and ideals of the EU , and European personalities.?
