The experience of the 1930s shows that this sort of situation breeds trade disputes and can trigger a protectionist response. So what can be done to discourage the U.S. from retaliating against countries that push down the value of their own currencies ? The most important tool for resisting protectionist sentiment in the 1930s was a monetary policy that promoted economic growth. Such policies worked during that era , when prices were falling and unemployment was unusually high , and the situation is similar today , if not as extreme. If fears of deflation were to subside and employment were to expand more rapidly , the pressure for a protectionist response from Washington would dissipate. When the economy is performing well , currency disputes become background noise 2.?
