章节摘录

Today I would like to talk about the early days of moviemaking in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Before the pioneering films of D.W. Griffith's, film-makers were limited by several misguided conventions of the era. According to one, the camera was always fixed at a viewpoint corresponding to that of the spectator in the theater, a position now known as the long shot. It was another convention that the position of the camera never changed in the middle of a scene. In last week's film, we saw how Griffith ignored both these limiting conventions and brought the camera closer to the actor. This shot, now known as the full shot, was considered revolutionary at the time. For Love of Gold was the name of the film in which we saw the first use of the full shot. After progressing from the long shot to the full shot, the next logical step for Griffith was to bring in the camera still closer, in what is now called the close-up. The close-up had been used before, though only rarely and merely as a visual stunt, as for example in Edwin Sprotter's The Great Train Robbery, which was made in 1903. But not until 1908 in Griffith's movie called After Many Years was the dramatic potential of the close-up first exploited. In a scene from After Many Years that we are about to see, pay special attention to the close-up of Annie Lee's worried face as she awaits her husband's return. In 1908 this close-up shocked everyone in the moviemaking world, but Griffith had no time for argument. He had another surprise even more radical to offer. Immediately following the close-up of Annie, he inserted a picture of the object of her thought —— her husband, cast away on a desert isle. This cutting from one scene to another without finishing either of them brought a torrent of criticism.
