章节摘录

版权页：插图：During the festival, street performances were held. After the lanterns were lit, the sounds of gongs and drums filled the streets in urban and suburban areas. Performances included dragon dances, lion lanterns and land boats, walking on stilts, carrying trunks, throwing stone blocks, juggling with poles, balancing jars on the head, and singing folk songs. The performers gave shows while walking along the streets. Arriving at an open space or invited by people sitting at tables in front of shops, they would stop to stage performances. The street performances usually ended at midnight, but on the 15th day, the main day of the Lantern Festival, the merry-making would last the entire night. In ancient times, the Lantern Festival is also a romantic holiday and could be seen as Chinese Valentine's Day. In ancient China, unmarried young girls are not allowed to go out free, but they could stroll out in company on festivals. And appreciating the flower lanterns on the Lantern Festival provides them an opportunity to communicate with others. The unmarried young men and women often make use of it to find a "target" for their future marriage. The young people also meet with their Valentines during the Festival. An ancient poem goes like this.
