<<追寻藏羚羊>>

内容概要

The Tibetan antelope is unique to China's Qinghai-Tibet Plateau. Its habitat is located 4,000-5,500 m above sea level, in Changtang in northern Tibet, and Hoh Xil in Qinghai Province and the Altun Mountains in the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region. This is an area of frozen soil, glaciers, lakes and marshes, known as the "forbidden zone". In an extremely hostile environment for man, the Tibetan antelope thrives.

Many other animals can hardly breathe at an altitude of 4,000-5,000 m, let alone run, yet the Tibetan antelope can run 20-30 km continuously at a speed of 60 kph, enabling it to outdistance its prey.

The Tibetan antelope is always alert to danger. It was only with the greatest difficulty that our photographer could get shots of the animals on the distant horizon, using a camera with a 400 long-focus lens plus a 2.8-times focal-augmenting lens, and having carefully camouflaged himself beforehand.

Yet, poachers have been slaughtering the Tibetan antelope for many years, reducing it to the status of an endangered species.
