章节摘录

版权页：Well, before I began my Crack Jimmy's shell challenge, I had more important things to do, like get the hell out of there. The famous La Tomatino Festival in Spain was about to happen and I had rigorously (严格地) organized my trip on the Internet. It's truly amazing the amount of information and help you can get from all the traveling websites. I like to be organized and prepared for all eventualities (n.不测事) that might happen. My air tickets and hotel were booked in advance, and I got all the 'juice' on visas, currency, and transportation (train from Valencia to Bunol-$3.00 !

) from the Net. I've printed off maps of the city and town, got lists of all the famous attractions, nightspots, and the best restaurants for that authentic paella (n.西班牙肉菜饭) experience. So anyway, the weekly festivals were in full motion and I was having the time of my life. A feeling of impending (adj.逼迫的, 迫切的) excitement was pervading (v.弥漫, 遍及) the air as everyone was getting ready for the culmination (n.顶点, 最高潮) of the festival-the biggest food fight in the world. 125 tonnes of tomatoes to be turned into human ketchup (n.番茄酱) in just two hours !

No one knows exactly why the tradition began back in the 1950's, but it has become a bit of a religious occasion for those who worship the Temple of the Great Tomato, and, incidentally, it's actually Christian. Doesn't matter much to me, I just wanted to be part of the chaos-I even wore a white suit. People say this is a metaphorical attempt at suicide, but I'm always up for a challenge !
