章节摘录

Brady's assistants adjusted the reflectors that kept shadows from appearing on the sitter's face. Then they brought up the head and body clamps. Taking a picture in those days wasn't done in an instant, as it is today. Even with good light, the subject had to stand perfectly still for many seconds. To make sure Lincoln's head wouldn't move, they would tighten an iron clamp around the back of his head where it wouldn't show. A second clamp would hold his back. But here was a problem Brady hadn't encountered before. Lincoln was so tall that the adjustable stand on which the head clamp rested wouldn't reach high enough. They all smiled at this. Lincoln was used to jokes about his height. He may have told one while an assistant looked for a stool to set the head clamp on. The camera was moved forward a bit. The photograph would have to show Lincoln from the knees upward to keep the stool out of the picture. Perhaps the delay or the false backdrop made Lincoln grow stiff and nervous as the camera was readied. The formal setting may have seemed out of place to him. Brady later recalled, "I had great trouble making a natural picture."
