Passage 2 The summer intern seemed bright and capable. A graduate student who had responded to an ad seeking help at a New York City documentary production office , showed up every day for two weeks and worked industriously. Then one day , he was gone-along with one of the office's laptops. "We had no evidence that he'd stolen it , " says the intern's former employer , filmmaker and communications consultant Murray Nossel. "But we couldn't track him down either." Emails , text messages and phone calls all went unreturned. So did the laptop. Since he started making films in 1996 , Nossel , who was nominated for an Oscar in 2003 , has employed some 100 interns. In another unfortunate incident a summer intern failed to leave on schedule at the end of August. "We couldn't get rid of him , " Nossel recalls. The young man , in his early 30s , had worked as a bank vice president before deciding he wanted to become a filmmaker. "It turned out he was hiding out from life , and from responsibility , in our office , "Nossel says. After that experience , Nossel started asking interns to sign a letter of agreement about their roles , responsibilities and employment dates. Also , he has found that they'll perform better if they're paid. A meager sum can make a difference.
