章节摘录

版权页：插图： There, men said, lay the most advanced science of the Universe, sealed up in a strangely constructed city, covered with the dust of eons. It had been seen from afar by this one; it had been reported by a man gone mad with thirst; it had crept down the centuries in the literature of space. One and all agreed that Parva and Parva alone contained the sum total of knowledge gathered by a vanished race, one which had been so far advanced that ethereal~ communication with the planets had been possible, that its spaceships could land on ground. That civilization had used atomic power, not radioactive fuel. Its men had been able to clothe themselves against the rigors of the many uninhabitable planets. And then Parva alone remained of all that great culture and Parva itself had died. But within it there must be the Great Secret. Of the Great Secret, men understood very little save that which had been expressed in a short formula. But with that formula a man might master all. Fanner Marston had no qualms about get out, for if he had the Great Secret, would not travel be a simple thing?. He could see himself ardvig in triumph on Earth, center of the universal culture which now obtained. He couldhear the cheering thortgs and fed the waves of adulation~ which would be his. And he could nearly taste the liquors-fantastically expensive and satisfying-which he would drink, and feel the warm flesh of the women who would love him, would love the master of the Universe. And he would tell men to go hither and thither; he would move great armies and fleets; he would cause vast conquests, and kings would bow before his brilliance and his might. For all of eternity he would be remembered. The Great Secret would be his.

——《出版人周刊》（PublishersWeekly）对我来说，罗恩·哈伯德这些故事的妙处在于，尽管它们是五六十年前出版，但是风格、内容和语言绝不陈旧。

现在读起来，它们依然像当初那样的清新有趣。

——安娜·麦卡菲读他的故事，总能让你感到一阵寒冷，同时有一点笑声。
