章节摘录

Passage Two The banking industry plays a critical role in a countrys financial system and economic development. If any country wants to build a healthy financial system and a stable, balanced economic development, a robust banking industry must be in place. For this reason, a banks business and operation should be consistent with its governments macro-economic policy. From a government perspective, if there is over-investment in some industry, or segment, the government will control this overheated industry or segment. If there are insufficient inputs in some industry or segment, and if this industry or segment is of strategic importance to either peoples life or a countrys development, it will be very natural for the government to try to mobilize more resources and capital there by promulgating macro-economic policy. Then the regulating authorities will seek to use their window guidance function to confine or boost the banking industrys loan growth to a reasonable level.

Sometimes, a banks overall loan growth goal and its loan growth aim for a specific industry is consistent with those of the regulating authorities. It means that the bank has the same judgment on the overall economic development and on a specific industrys prospect with the government. In practice, it is shown in the banks decision on lending business, whether to increase, maintain, gradually decrease or even withdraw the loan disbursement in some industry. While sometimes, it is not the case. Because the government views economy from a national perspective and there must be imbalance between different regions and clients. It is a kind of tradeoff between long-term interest and short-term returns, a healthy national economy and a banks profitability. We cannot deny that there are still some high quality clients in some overheated industry. Banks can still make great profits via lending to them. But for the banking industry, the overall economic development is the cornerstone of its current and sustainable profitability. Therefore, for its lending business, a bank must take the governments macro policy into consideration, balancing with its own current loan portfolio, and adjust it to be in line with the governments macro policy and meet the banks own profitability goal.
