章节摘录

Vim Cerf , who helped to build the Internet while working as a researcher in America , said that television was approaching its "iPod moment". In the same way that people now download their favourite music onto their iPod , he said that viewers would soon be downloading most of favourite programmes onto their computers. "85 percent of all video we watch is pre-recorded , so you can set your system to download it all the time , " said Mr Cerf , who is now the vice president of the Google , the worlds largest search engine. "Youre still going to need live television for certain things like news , sporting events and emergencies—but increasingly it is going to be almost like the iPod , where you download content to look at later." But some critics , including some internet service providers , have warned that the Internet will collapse under the strain of millions of people downloading programmes at the same time. Broadband companies claim that the service will cause "traffic jams" , which will cost millions of pounds to sort out. But Mr Cerf dismissed the warnings as "scare tactics" , saying that critics had predicted 20 years ago that the net would collapse when people all around the world started to use it.

"In the intervening 30 years its increased a million times... Were far from exhausting the capacity , " he said. "Its an understandable worry when they see huge amounts of information being moved around online."
