章节摘录

Contrary to widely held opinion, most Americans like or even love their work. In 2002 an amazing 89 percent of workers said they were very satisfied or somewhat satisfied with their jobs. This isn't true just for those with high-paying, highly skilled jobs but for all workers across the board. And the percentage is almost exactly the same among those with and without college degrees and among those working for private companies, nonprofit organizations, and the government. Among those people who say they are very happy in their lives, 95 percent are also satisfied with their jobs. Furthermore, job satisfaction would seem to be causing overall happiness.

Matrimony has taken a lot of hits since the 1960s. In 2004, 42 percent of married Americans said they were very happy. Just 23 percent of never-married people said this. The happiness numbers were even lower for other groups: Only 20 percent of those who were widowed, 17 percent of those who were divorced. And generally speaking, married women say they're happy more often than married men. Marriage isn't just associated with happiness; it brings happiness, at least for a lot of us. One 2003 study that followed 24,000 people for more than a decade proved a significant increase in happiness after people married. For some, the happiness increase wore off in a few years. But for others, it lasted as long as a lifetime.
