章节摘录

4. The Question of Taiwan amid the Core National Interests Taiwan has always been a sacred part of China's territory. The Question of Taiwan not only involves China's general and particular interests, but also relates to its core national interests. It is also the key question concerning China's national security. Compatriots on both sides of the Taiwan Straits are communities with blood bonds, and China is the common homeland of the compatriots on both sides of the Straits. For the Chinese nation, safeguarding the integrity of national territory and sovereignty as well as ethnic unity is not a short-term political demand and general political choice, but comes from a strong sense of history formed in the accumulation of the long river of Chinese history running through thousands of years, a national sentiment deeply rooted in the fertile soil of the civilization of the Chinese nation in the past 5,000 years, as well as the core and essence of the traditional cultural heritage of the Chinese nation. Since the Qin Dynasty (221-206BC) established China's first unified multi-ethnic country, creating a new epoch of unification in Chinese history, unification has always occupied a dominant position in China's political life and national sentiment. Unification is regarded as the regular canon of Heaven and Earth, and the coherent rule of past and present.
