章节摘录

China's party system and the governance of the Communist Party of China provide special significance for inner-party democracy in the construction of democratic politics in China. Multiparty cooperation and political consultation led by the Communist Party are part of the basic political system of modern China. In the practice of governance for more than 60 years, the party has formed a series of ideas of its own for democratic governance and established systems and institutions for it. The party is actively exploring new approaches and methods for democratic governance. Besides reforming leadership and work systems, the most important way for the party to put out the concept of democratic governance is to develop inner-party democracy, which means establishing a system to guarantee the democratic rights of party members, improving the party's congress system, giving full play to the function of plenary party committee sessions, reforming the inner-party election system, and improving the inner-party supervision system. Of them, perfecting the congress system receives the most attention. The Communist Party of China establishes congress systems in organizations at levels of county or above, and a party congress is held once every five years. The Party Constitution stipulates that congresses at all levels and the corresponding committees elected by them are the leading bodies of the party. When a congress is in session, it usually serves as a leading body; when it is in recess, committees at all levels exercise leadership functions. Deputies to a party congress at all levels can play their roles when the congress is in session but not during recess. To deal with this, the party has experimented with a permanent system of party congresses and made significant achievements in 12 municipalities, counties and districts of five provinces since the late 1980s. Jiaojiang District of Taizhou Municipality in Zhejiang Province shows typical significance in carrying out the permanent system of its party congress. The expression of "expanding experimental units of the permanent system of the party congress in municipalities and counties and exploring ways to maintain the function of deputies when the party congress is in recess" was written into the political report at the 16th National Congress of the Communist Party of China in November 2002. After the 16th National Congress, all parts of the country initiated this reform.

When it comes to the topic of China's Democratic Politics and Sino-American Relationship , some people say it is sensitive , and some say it has no solution However , Professor Liu Jianfei tells us , democracy is exactly the meeting point of the interests of China and the US , because China wants to develop its democracy while the US intends to promote its democracy , and the two countries are divided only on the specific issues on how to build democracy. "Turning the gully of divergence into a channel of communication" should be the attitude and the strategy to be adopted by both parties. And what is done by this book is just exemplary of this saying. — Li Junru , member of the Standing Committee of the CPPCC , former vice-president of the Party School of the Central Committee of the CPC

Associating China's construction of democratic politics with international strategy in thinking has pioneering significance that is exciting and thought-provoking in terms of both academic study and policy-making thinking. — Wang Jisi , dean of the Peking University School of International Studies

In the "global village" era , China's construction of socialist democratic politics calls for not only favorable internal conditions but also an ideal external environment , including the coordinated balance and healthy interaction between democracy and Sino-American relationship. With a keen vision of his research field and efforts of his in-depth study and thinking for more than a decade , Professor Liu has done a serious piece of research on the important topic of "China's Democratic Politics and Sino-American Relationship , " made admirable achievements , and put forward many academically valuable ideas. — Ji Zhengju , director of the Central Compilation & Translation Bureau Research Institute for World Socialism and editor-in-chief of the magazine of Contemporary World and Socialism
