章节摘录

D Boiler rooms are often dirty and steamy , but this one is clean and cool. Fox Point is a very new 47-unit living building in South Bronx , one of the city's poorest areas. Two-thirds of the people living there are formerly ( 以前 ) homeless people , whose rent is paid by the government. The rest are low- mcome families. The boiler room has special equipment , which produces energy for electricity and heat. It reuses heat that would otherwise be lost to the air , reducing carbon emissions ( 碳排放 ) while also cutting costs. Fox Point'is operated by Palladia , a group that specializes in providing housing and services to needy people. Palladia received support from Enterprise Community Partners ( ECP ) , which helps build affordable housing by providing support to hous- ing developers. ECP has created national standards for healthy , environ- mentally ( 环境方面 ) clever and affordable homes which are called the Green Communities Standards. These staridards in- clude water keeping , energy saving and the use of environmen- tally friendly building materials. Meeting the standards increa- ses housing construction costs by 2% , which is rapidly paid back by lower running costs. Even the positioning of a window to get most daylight can help save energy. Michael Bloomberg , New York's mayor , plans to create 165 , 000 affordable housing units for 500 , 000 New Yorkers. Almost 80% of New York City's greenhouse- gas emissions come from buildings , and 40% of those are caused by hous- ing. So he recently announced that the city's Department of Housing and Preservation and Development ( DHPD ) , whose duty is to develop and keep the city's supply of affordable housing , will require allits new projects to follow ECP's green standards. Similar measures have been taken by other cities , such as Cleveland and Denver , but New York's DHPD is the largest city developer of affordable housing in the country.
