章节摘录

版权页：插图：Due to the gradual disappearance of traditional international trade barriers, environment and ecology have become commonly used means for international trade protectionism in recent years. With the development of economic globalization and increasingly fierce international competition, the relevance between trade and environment is constantly strengthened, and exercises an increasingly profound influence on global political and economic patterns and sustainable development. Negotiations on new WTO rules show how environmental externality has now become a major part of the international trade policy system. Despite the fact that the WTO is not exactly an environmental organization, it has a duty of protecting the environment, and most of its trade agreements touch on this. In recent years, international-trade competition has been getting tougher and the requirements on environmental protection standards have accordingly become stricter; more and more environmental protection measures are being formulated to cover a constantly widening range of economic sectors so that almost all industries are now covered, which has become an important means of competition. For instance, frequently promulgated and modified environment-related laws and regulations have evolved into mandatory requirements on process and production methods (PPMs) from the initial environmental requirements for the final product.
