章节摘录

The Mawangdui Han Tombs were the family cemetery of Licang (birth year unknown—185 B.C.), who originally served as the prime minister of Changsha State and was later entitled "Dai Hou." Among the many tombs excavated, No. 1 Tomb was the largest and the excavated relics were the most diverse and exquisite. It was the tomb of Xinzhui, Licang's wife who died in 165 B.C. No. 2 Tomb was where Licang himself was buried, and No. 3 was the burial place of his son. The lacquer mug is part of the large collection of lacquerware excavated from the Mawangdui Han Tombs. There were about forty double-handled mugs in three sizes—large, medium and small. This is a medium-sized one. Made of wood, it was lacquered red inside and black outside. The inner surface, edge and handles are red, and decorated with a lively cloud pattern. In the center of the bottom are three Chinese characters, literally translated as "drink to your heart's content": evidently there was an easy conviviality on social occasions. The double-handled mug also had a more elegant name—"feather mug." This name alludes to the drinking etiquette of the time. Anyone who proposed a toast first had to pick his subject, and would then insert a feather into the mug. If given a feathered mug, the guest had to drain the contents immediately without excuse or hesitation. As time went on, feather mug became the general name for a two-handled mug. This mug spans more than two millennia, but the lacquer still looks bright. The combination of red and black was eye-catching, but was also a symbol of wealth and luxury in the Han Dynasty and a clue to the hospitable and bibulousness of the era.
