前言

This book is aimed at the reader of English majors. It mainly addresses the topic of English sentence skills, which comprise of sentence extension and combination techniques, correction methods of five common errors, the use of punctuation in sentence combination, extension, and error correction, and finally diction. two main distinguishing features in this book: first, it tries to apply the three different approaches of grammar, rhetoric, and even logic to English sentence writing; second, it tries to teach the readers to learn sentence writing in the context of paragraph. From Unit One to Unit Six, the book mainly discusses sentence extension and combination skills. Unit One establishes six criteria for sentence classification. Six criteria for sentence classification are: the role of a sentence in the paragraph, the extent of abstraction, different communicative functions, grammatical structure, emphasis or the location of the essential information in a sentence, the length of a sentence. Understanding these methods of classification is crucial in writing effective sentences. Unit Two discusses different communicative functions of four major syntactic classes, with further classification and their applications in paragraph. It especially explores the logical applications of statements or declarative sentences in sentence and paragraph writing. Unit Three discusses the sentence extension in broad and narrow senses: the narrow one is sentence expansion based on basic sentence patterns; the broad one is expansion through coordination and subordination. It starts with the narrow sense and ends with the broad one. Unit Four first illustrates the different effects between loose and periodic sentences, then discusses definition of and recognition issues on periodic sentences, as well as methods of conversion from loose to periodic, and finally the mixed use of loose, periodic, and balanced sentences. Unit Five addresses five main issues: the criteria for the best sentence combination, nine methods in sentence combination, logical problems in sentence combination, when and where to use short and long sentences, and the problem of uniform length sentences. This unit puts forwards three criteria, which also serve as the three steps, and illustrates how the three criteria are applied in real situations. Unit Six discusses ways to avoid subject-first sentences, that is, sentence variety through non-subject-first sentences, for the major weaknesses of over-use of subject-first sentences are childish and monotonous.

章节摘录

II. Combine the following simple choppy sentences respectively both into one loose sentence and one The president towered over everybody. He was stiffon braced legs. He was in a big brown periodic sentence. suit. His one hand was holding his hat on his heart. His other hand was clutching the arm of his son. His son was an Air Corps Officer. His son strongly resembled him. III. Spot the periodic sentences and change them back into the loose ones and compare the effects. In the evening, I suspected that there must be someone hiding somewhere. I searched every comer carefully, but found nobody. So I closed the door and moved the table against the door in order to prevent any misfortune. Deep that night when I lay in bed, a strange sound, as if someone were trying to break in, which made my hair stand on end, was heard. I had a cold sweat over. How I regretted that I had come back alone. In order to banish the fear I hid myself deep in my quilt. The fear that the bad man might discover that a young girl was in the room alone prevented me from breathing freely. IV. Change the following periodic Free from all sycophancy and obsequiousness——a quality invaluable among sentence into a loose sentence. both colonial and semi-colonial people, Lu Xun, a great man of letter, a great thinker, a revolutionary, a man of unyielding integrity, was the chief commander of Chinas Cultural Revolution. V. Rewrite the following paragraph to give it more variety in sentence structure. Make any other improvements that you can. Values play a major role in our society. People use these values to make certain decisions in their lives. Values can be stated as a persons view of right and wrong. Courage is an extension of a persons values. Courage takes a persons values and puts them into the persons life. How people use their courage is completely up to them. This courage could be physical or mental. Anyone can make a courageous act. It is only the ones who follow through their intentions by actions who are truly courageous.
