章节摘录

插图：One way to explore the universe is by looking at distant galaxies through telescopes. Even simple telescopes can help us see stars that are millions of light-years away. Finding planets, however, is much more difficult. Planets and moons give out no light of their own. They do reflect some light from their nearby star, but this light is swamped¹ by the light of the star. Stars shine about a billion times brighter than planets. Although no one has ever seen a planet outside our solar system, we do know they exist. To detect planets, scientists have to study the effects planets have on the stars they orbit. The presence of a planet can make a star wobble² slightly. The wobble is produced by the force of gravity between the star and the planet as the planet orbits the star. Using the most powerful telescopes, scientists can tell when a star is wobbling. Since 1996, many planets have been discovered using this method. Unfortunately, only very large planets can be detected this way. One recently discovered planet is 11 times the size of Jupiter. Jupiter is the largest planet in our solar system. It is about 1,319 times bigger than Earth. Scientists don't think there is much hope of finding life on very large planets. Life, as we know it, seems to be best suited to planets that are neither too big nor too small. Any planets they find by detecting wobbling stars probably won't be hospitable to life.
