章节摘录

On Christmas morning a nearly frozen John Steward crawled out from the cardboard box across the street from Columbia University. He has lived there for two years, but because its not a valid address, he cant collect welfare. The lone nickel inside his coat pocket would hardly get him breakfast. But Steward wasnt worried. While he was panhandling for spare change the day before on upper Broadway in Manhattan, someone handed him a booklet of vouchers good for a dollars worth of food at any of seven local stores. Trading them in for a bagel and coffee at a nearby deli, Steward lauded the new program: "People who wont give us money because they think well buy drugs and alcohol are more likely to help out now." That is exactly the goal of the New York City merchants and community activists who set up the program in December. This is about improving the quality of life for everyone in the neighborhood. We hope it encourages people who have stopped giving out of a legitimate concern for where their money is going to start giving again," said Laura Friedman, co-coordinator of West Side Cares, the volunteer group running the program. The coupons, which sell for their face value of 25 cents, cannot be used to buy alcohol or tobacco or be exchanged for cash. While the program has won some praise in New York, similar initiatives in a dozen other cities, including Chicago, Seattle and San Francisco, have received mixed reviews. In Berkeley, California, 70% of the 250,000 vouchers bought by residents over the past two years have been redeemed, while only 15% of the 8,000 vouchers purchased in Portland, Oregon, have been used. "
