章节摘录

Except for the many fires started by the bombs , London was dark from afternoon until morning during the blitz. A "blackout" was in place all through the city whenever an attack was expected. This helped keep the bombers from knowing the exact location of particular buildings. To children and adults alike the awful sounds of the approaching airplane motors , the whistles made by the bombs , and the massive explosions were a nightmare made real. Many small children were terrified. The planes and their bombs were so powerful that even their parents couldnt protect them. Harold , who was past the age when he thought his parents had godlike powers , was scared. But he wasnt terrified. Besides , like most of the older boys , he felt he had to put up a brave front. This afternoon was only one of many afternoons he had to sit in the shelter for an hour or more. He had gotten used to it , that by now , he didnt just pretend to be brave. He actually got bored , having to stay in the shelter so long. Now , stretching his cramped limbs , he glanced at his father , Jack , a city man who had never fired a gun. He looked at his mother , Frances , cheerful and loving.
