章节摘录

(2) It was a network of news and sentiment built by a family kept at a distance because of the war. But they all stayed close through the written word. All seven brothers returned safely from World War II. Only Ralph Wyciskalla is alive today and living in Tamaroa. For the remaining six veteran brothers, they live on through their letters home. Although for almost 60 years, the pages were forgotten. "Three years ago, we cleaned out the old house and found them," said Ralph. "It was fascinating, you just couldn't put them down. When you started opening the envelopes — you see the dates on there 1944, 1945," said Ralph's wife Virginia Wyciskalla.

(3) The stationery and sheets of notebook paper, yellowed and worn by time, detail the brothers' day-to-day lives. Responses from Helen Wyciskalla and the sisters tell of difficulties at home. Above all, one message rings clear: a mother in the heartland missed her seven sons.

(4) "I don't know how she lived through it. It's amazing that she did, I guess those old letters were what kept her going," said Ralph. Virginia says the collection of letters and wartime mementos also gives the next generation of Wyciskallas a look at their ancestors from the Greatest Generation. "They were preserved for a reason, I think it was for us to pass on to our kids and their kids, just something that their family had been through and they came back and were safe," said Virginia.
