章节摘录

版权页：插图： I drank a little of my whisky and then said, "Your brother wanted to find King Solomon's Mines. That is why he set out for Inyati." Both men looked surprised. "King Solomon's Mines!" Sir Henry exclaimed. "I have never heard of them. Where are they?" "You have to cross one hundred and thirty miles of desert to reach them," I said. "Then you have to cross some mountains! do not believe any white man has ever reached them. There is a legend about them. I will tell you what I know if you promise to keep it secret. I have my reasons for asking this." "You have our promise," Sir Henry said. "An elephant hunter called Evans told me the legend," I said. "I found a ruined city northwest of the Suliman Mountains,' he told me. 'Suliman is another spelling of Solomon. It was there that Solomon had his diamond mines.' " "How do you know that?" I asked him. "An old witch doctor told me,' he said. 'He called them bright stones.' "I thought no more about this, and Evans died a few months later. Then one evening a Portuguese man, Jose Silvestri, came to my camp and asked to stay the night. I was ill with a fever, but we had a meal together. The next day he said, 'When we meet again, I shall be the richest man in the world.' "I didn't believe him, of course, but I said nothing. A week or more passed. My fever left me, and I was eating a good dinner when a man came out of the jungle."
