章节摘录

A presentation is a form of communication with an audience. The objective of a presentation is to transmit information or opinions to an audience in your own words , within a limited amount of time. There are three types of presentations according to their purpose : to inform , to persuade , and to build goodwill. With an informative presentation , you may be teaching your audience about something , you may be talking about a death-defying experience , or you could be describing your business to your leads group. Whatever your subject is , your primary goal is to deliver a speech or presentation that is descriptive. Your objective is not to sell anything or persuade anyone. It is merely to teach or inform. Informative presentations include talks , seminars , proposals , workshops , conferences , and meetings where the presenter or presenters share their expertise , and information is exchanged. With the persuasive presentation , your reason for speaking is to persuade your audience to agree with you. While this category may deal with an idea , a theory , or a product , your objective is to have your audience understand and agree with your point of view. Persuasive presentations are often motivational. Whatever your motivation with the persuasive presentation , it is of utmost importance that you are convincing. Your success will be determined by how effectively you can sway your audience to see the story your way. ....
