章节摘录

A critical prerequisite for a VMI model to work is the mutual trust and effective information sharing established by the participating parties. If the information between the supplier and the manufacturer does not flow smoothly and is shared in time, created often by a lack of trust, it is difficult to achieve the major benefits of the VMI. Since the beginning of the implementation, lack of trust between the Sinopec subsidiaries and their suppliers has been present. This is deeply influenced in particular by traditional practices of living in a 'large inventory ensures good supply' paradigm for a long time. For this reason, subsidiary companies are skeptical about VMI efficiency and quite concerned about potentially heightened prices and possible shortages, even though they received training on VMI before the implementation. For example, some managers are specifically worried about the 'what if' question in two scenarios. One scenario has to do with a prosperous market, in which a supplier may charge higher price for the same materials. If the Sinopec subsidiary does not accept the price, there is concern that the supplier may shift to other buyers who are willing to pay, causing the Sinopec subsidiary to go out of stock. The other scenario concerns the subsidiary's skepticism about the supplier's capability and commitment to perform the JIT delivery. As a result, the implementation of VMI has actually increased the anxiety of both parties. The managers still require the vendors to provide more VMI materials than actually needed, and the suppliers, under the demand pressure and competition, are willing to conform to the buyers' requests.
