章节摘录

Whilst proper care must be taken with the stowage of all iron and steel, cargoes of pig iron, steel billets, round bars and pipes are particularly difficult to secure effectively. In the upper tween decks of many two and three deck ships the absence of hatch coamings more than a few inches high adds to the difficulty of securing pig iron and billets carried abreast the hatchways and there appears to be a greater risk of cargo shifting in these spaces than in the lower holds. The most effective way to secure these cargoes is to level them and over-stow them with other suitable cargo. The over-stow should have sufficient rigidity or weight to act as a positive preventative to the movement of pig iron, steel billets, bars, etc. Large quantities of uncovered pig iron or billets should not be carried in the upper-tween decks with the intention of obtaining an unduly low metacentric height since this does not eliminate the risk of cargo shifting and may endanger the ship if it does shift.
