章节摘录

First of all , the objective and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights The Charter 0 , the United Nations lays down the basic principles for international relations . which call for equality between sovereign states . settlement of international disputes through peaceful means , noninfringement upon other countries ' territorial integrity and political independence , and noninterference into other countries ' internal affairs . Ever since its founding , the world body has taken respecting and protecting human rights as one of its three main objectives . The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations in 1948 provides a set of authoritative details for implementation of the principles laid down in the Charter on the United Nations , for human rights and basic freedoms . Because of this , the Declaration and the Charter is consistent in essence and spirit with regard to the question of human rights . Respecting and upholding the objective and principles of the Charter and Declaration is a must if the international human rights cause is to enjoy a sound development . As the basic criteria for guiding international relations , these constitute a reliable guarantee for the realization of world peace and development and for the building of a harmonious world . We hold that the objective and principles of the Charter and Declaration must be upheld , and that the role played by the United Nations must be strengthened constantly .
