章节摘录

版权页：插图：The day I left for Xinjiang, my father happened to be sick. That after-noon in September 1961, my father walked out with a cane to see me off, followed by my elderly mother. Since I had luggage, I called a tricycle and set off to the train station, the old couple following behind. The sight of them hobbling at my heels was too much for me. So I told them over my shoulders, "Mom and dad, you can rest assured I can take care of myself, so please don't follow the tricycle any farther", but they wouldn't hear of it. At first the tricycle moved ahead slowly and they were able to keep up, my father limping along on his cane and my mother hobbling on with tears in her eyes. As the tricycle picked up speed, they gradually disappeared out of sight, fading into the distance, melting into the crowd in the street. At that time I didn't cry; however, when the train started moving and accelerated into the Pearl River Plain, sitting by the window, I burst into tears and my old parents hastened to the distant and strange Xinjiang without knowing when I would be able to return. I remembered too how my parents looked as they tried to follow the tricycle. I did cry then; it was my first time to cry since entering adulthood. It was also my first time to realize with great agony that our generation had to confront the dilemma between career and family and make a painful decision in order to better serve our country's development.
