章节摘录

Passage 13 Most people like living with other people. But some people just have to be by themselves. Bozo Kucik was one of the examples. In 1888, when Bozo was only six-teen, his father left him on a little island off the coast of Croatia. He kissed Bozo goodbye and said, "I hope everything goes well with you, my son." Then the father got back in his boat and sailed home without his son. How could he do such a thing, you ask?

Well, Bozo had asked him to. Bozo's father was a poor farmer who couldn't afford to feed his seven children. So he called his sons together and asked them to decide their own futures. Bozo chose the life of a hermit.

During the years that Bozo lived alone, World Wars I and II were fought. But Bozo never heard about them. In 1972, a group of fishermen visited his island. They tried to talk to Bozo. At first the old hermit ran away. Finally, he let the men into his windowless stone house. They asked if he wanted to go home. But Bozo said no. So the fishermen wished Bozo well and left him alone again——just as his father had eighty-four years before.
