章节摘录

It was eight o'clock in the evening. I'd just arrived at Heathrow Airport with my family and we were worn out after the long flight. We were going to stay in London for a few days before travelling to Dublin. Some friends of ours had told us to get a taxi to our hotel, so we went to look for one. The airport was very bright and modern, but as soon as we came out, we found ourselves in a dark place of car parks and bus stations. We couldn't see taxis anywhere, so we asked someone to tell us the way, but he didn't speak English. Suddenly a big, friendly-looking man came up to us and said, "Give me your cases (箱子). I'll take them to the taxi stand for you." I told him not to worry because our cases weren't heavy, but he just picked up my wife's case and told us to follow him. I told him to come back but he didn't stop. When we reached the taxi stand, he put the case down and asked me to give him ten pounds. I couldn't believe it. Ten pounds seemed too expensive for just walking a hundred meters with one not very heavy case, but I was too tired to say anything, so I took out my wallet. However, I only had a fifty-pound note. I said, "I'm sorry, I haven't got any change." "No problem," he said. "Wait here and I'll ask one of the taxi drivers to change it." He disappeared round the corner. He never came back, of course.
