章节摘录

A : Fine , thank you. As you may be aware , the possible responses to How are you in this exchange are strictly limited by conversational rules. The great majority of the time , a native speaker will simply say Fine. It is also perfectly acceptable to make some other positive comment such as Pretty well , OK , Not bad , Great , etc. What is not acceptable , however , is to treat this seriously as a question and give either a long response or one that is in any way negative. You should not give a detailed explanation of your recent health difficulties , nor should you say Terrible , which would then require the other person to ask about your troubles. Another subtlety which students of English often get mixed up has to do with the difference between greetings and introductions. For example , what is the proper response when you meet a person for the first time and he or she says , How do you do ?

You probably know that you should not answer this question Fine , or thanks. Instead , the proper response is to repeat the same question , How do you do? or to say , /t's nice to meet you. Here the interrogative-form sentence How do you do ?

and the statement-form sentence /t's nice to meet you have exactly the same discourse meaning. They are both formulas for a special type of phatic communion that occurs only when meeting a person for the first time.

On every subsequent meeting , even if a long time has passed , you must use a different set of formulas. With someone you have met before , the interrogative-form question changes to How are you? (or How are you doing ?

.) and the statement-form question changes to Nice to see you. Many Chinese students , even those who have a very strong command of English grammar and vocabulary , will persist in the mistake of greeting friends with the expression , Nice to meet you. This is unfortunate because it makes
