章节摘录

China is now an important trade power. China initiated economic reforms in 1978, when it endeavoured to change from the centrally planned economic system of the Soviet system, to one based on a market economy. China is now pursuing a "socialist market economy", with the State still playing an important role in the economy, which is developing into a full-fledged market economy. Despite the remaining state role, the economy bears all the major features of any other market economy, such as free competition and the market interplay between supply and demand. The socialist percentage (state-owned portion) is reducing through restructuring capital ownership while the percentage ownership of private and foreign capital is constantly increasing. China's legislation has closely followed the practice of a market economy. In 1993, the 8th National People's Congress (NPC) amended the national constitution to emphasize the importance of a private economy and stipulate that China pursues a socialist market economy. During 1993-2003, the basic laws regulating the market economy were formulated. The most important law protecting private property is about to be adopted in the 10th NPC Session. The socialist market economy has boosted the Chinese economy and revitalized it. The Chinese economy has developed quickly, with a 9.4 percent annual GDP growth rate. Table 1 shows the progress made in recent years. In recent years, based on this economic growth, China has also achieved unprecedented process in foreign trade and in attracting foreign investment. Using 2004 as an example, trade volume scored $1,154.74 billion, an increase of 35.7 percent since 2003.
