章节摘录

People who struggle with excessive Internet use may be depressed or have other mood disorders, Orzack said. When she discusses Internet habits with her patients, they often report that being online of-fers a "sense of belonging, an escape, excitement [ and ] fun, " she said. "Some people say relief..., be-cause they find Some parts of the Internet seem to draw people in more than others. Internet garners themselves so relaxed. " spend countlesshours competing in games against people from all over the world. One such game, called World of War-craft, is cited on many sites by posters complaining of a "gaming addiction". Andrew Heidrich, an education network administrator from Sacramento, plays World of Warcraft forabout two to four hours every other night, but that's nothing compared with the 40 to 60 hours a week hespent playing online games when he was in college. He cut back only after a full-scale family intervention, in which relatives told him he'd gained weight. "There's this whole culture of competition that sucks people in" with online gaming, said Heidrieh , now a father of two. "People do it at the expense of everything that was a constant in their lives." Heid-rich now visits websites that discuss gaming addiction regularly "to remind myself to keep my love for on-line games in Toebe also regularly visits a site where posters discuss Internet overuse. In August, when she check." firstrealized she had a problem, she posted a message on a Yahoo Internet addiction group with the subjectline: "I "I'm self-employed and need the Internet for my work, but I'm failing to have an Internet Addiction. " accomplish my work, totake care of my home, to give attention to my children, "she wrote in a message sent to the group. "Ihave no money or insurance to get professional help; I can't even pay my mortgage and f' , u~losing everything. "
